Located between the Antalya and Fethiye bays on the Teke Peninsula in southwestern Turkey, Kaş, historically known as Antiphellos, is a coastal town with a history dating back to 6000 BCE, serving as a commercial port for the Lycian civilization. Surrounded by significant ancient sites like Patara, Xanthos, Letoon, Simena, Phellos, and Myra, Kaş sits at the foot of the Taurus Mountains, overlooking the Mediterranean.

Yeniköy, situated 600 meters above sea level in Kaş, offers panoramic views of the Mediterranean, including the Çukurbağ Peninsula, the Greek island of Meis, and various small landmasses. The sloping terrain from the Taurus Mountains allows for a continuous experience of the landscape, characterized by olive trees, arid vegetation, red soil, and intense sunlight.

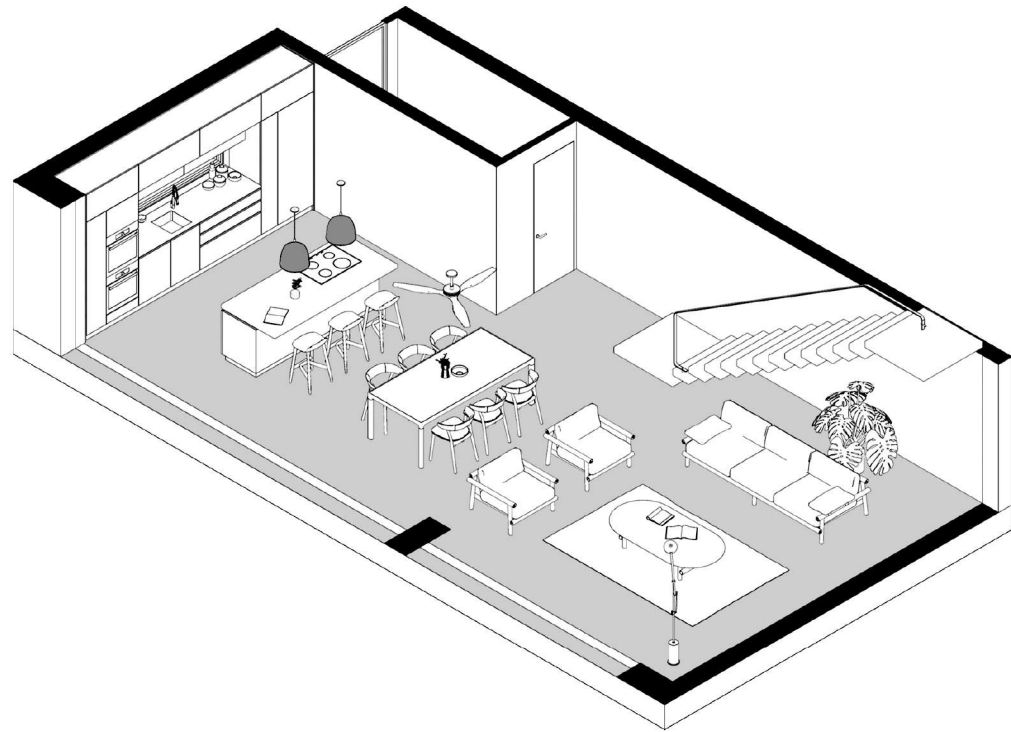

This rich topography played a crucial role in the design, emphasizing two key principles: integrating the natural environment into the structure and making the building a part of the surrounding topography. The design concept emerged from adapting the building to the existing slope, with three different levels created to accommodate the six-meter elevation difference. The sequence of spaces flows from the entry level downwards, creating a north-south circulation and allowing the structure to maintain a modest height.

The layout also considered the relationship between shared, semi-shared, and private spaces. A double-height space was created at the intersection of the shared areas on both floors, directly connecting the interior with the landscape through expansive glazing. This allowed the view and natural light to permeate the interior. Additionally, a semi-shared space was formed by intersecting shared and private areas, fostering continuity and connectivity throughout the structure.
